2. The Attorney General of British Columbia respectfully submits:

- (a) that ss. 429 and 430 of the Criminal Code (as they read in May, 1985) do not violate s. 11(f) of the Charter and that therefore the first constitutional question should be answered in the negative and the second constitutional question need not be answered;
- (b) that the third constitutional question should not be answered as it raises an academic issue, but if it is answered, then ss. 429 and 430 of the Criminal Code (as they read in May, 1985) do not violate s. 15 of the Charter and therefore it is not necessary to answer the fourth constitutional question.

Section 11(f)

3. There is no constitutional right to be tried by a court composed of a judge alone. As the Appellants were afforded their constitutional right to be tried by a court composed of a judge and jury, they have no valid claim under s. 11(f) of the Charter. The Attorney General of British Columbia adopts the reasons of the Court of Appeal with respect to this issue at pp. 83-86 of the Appeal Book.

Section 15(1) of the Charter - The Issue is Academic

4. The Attorney General of British Columbia respectfully submits that the third constitutional question should not be answered since the issues raised therein are of academic interest only.

5. A ruling from this Court that s. 430 of the Criminal Code (as it read in May, 1985) violates s. 15 of the Charter would be of no assistance to the Appellants or to anyone else. If s. 430 of the Criminal Code was struck down, the

1 only result would be that in Alberta an accused charged with 2 murder would not be entitled to a trial by a court composed
3 of a judge alone. This ruling would not change the position
4 of the Appellants at all. They would still be limited to a
5 trial by a judge and jury.
6
7
8
9

10
11 6. Since s. 430 has now been repealed and replaced, there
12 is absolutely no reason to determine whether it was valid
13 prior to December of 1985. Invalidating it will not result
14 in any convictions in Alberta being quashed, as it was a mode
15 of trial that an accused in Alberta chose.
16
17
18
19
20
21

22
23 7. The learned trial Judge in the Court below erred
24 insofar as he held that any inequality occasioned by ss. 429
25 and 430 could be remedied by affording to the Appellants the 26 option of being tried by a judge alone as well as by a court
27 composed of a judge and jury. If there was any unjustifiable
28 inequality caused by ss. 429 and 430 of the Code (which is 29 denied), and if any remedy was to be granted then it would 30 have been to invalidate this exceptional provision rather 31 than extend its content to all accused in all provinces of 32 Canada. The approach adopted by the learned trial Judge
33 unnecessarily cast doubt on the validity of all murder
34
35
36
37
38

1 convictions prior to Dec. 1985 in every province, other than
2 Alberta, where appeals are still outstanding.
3
4
5

6
7 8. To extend to the accused in Ontario the same right
8 that the accused has in Alberta to elect a trial by a judge
9 of the superior court without a jury involves extensive
10 rewriting of the provisions of the Criminal Code. The Court
11 would be required not only to strike down s. 429 of the Code
12 but to "amend" ss. 464, 484 and 488 of the Code by deleting
13 the reference in those sections to "section 427", so that the 14 election of the accused applies to every indictable offence.
15
16

17 However, that "remedy" simply creates a new "inequality".
18

20 The accused in Ontario would now be entitled to be tried by a
21 magistrate (and arguably by a County Court judge) for any
22 indictable offence whereas the accused in Alberta would only
23 be entitled to be tried by a superior court judge. To 24 correct this unequal treatment ss. 464 and 484 would have to 25 be rewritten to limit the accused's right to a trial by 26 superior court judge when the offence charged is one listed
27 in s. 427 of the Code. Invalidating both ss. 429 and 430
28 does not assist the Appellants because s. 498 of the Code
29 still provides the Attorney General with the right to require 30 a trial by a judge and jury. If, however, only s. 429 is 31 struck down then it would be necessary for the Court to also 32
33
34
35
36
37
38

1 strike down s. 498 since that limit on the accused's right to
2 be tried by judge alone probably does not apply in Alberta.
3
4 (See Appendix A for the above-mentioned provisions.)
5
6

7
8 9. This rewriting of the Criminal Code is inconsistent
9 with the Court's function under the Charter. In Hunter v.
10 Southam, [1984] 2 S.C.R. 145 @ 169. Mr. Justice Dickson (as 11 he then was) stated:
12
13
14
15

16 "While the courts are guardians of the Constitution
17 and of individuals' rights under it, it is the 18 legislature's responsibility to enact legislation
19 that embodies appropriate safeguards to comply with 20 the Constitution's requirements. It should not 21 fall to the courts to fill in the details that will 22 render legislative lacunae constitutional."
23
24
25

26 10. The only way to ensure identical treatment between an 27 accused in Alberta and an accused in all other provinces is 28 for Parliament to step in and legislate amendments to the 29 Criminal Code as it did in 1985 with the repeal and 30 re-enactment of s. 430.
31
32
33
34
35
36

37
38 11. The third constitutional question, if answered, will 39 resolve important and complex issues under the Charter. The 40 resolution of these issues should, however, be left to a case
41 where the impugned legislation is extant and the controversy
42 between the parties is real and meaningful.
43
44
45
46
47

1 Section 15 - The Merits
2
3

4 12. If the third constitutional question is to be
5 answered, then the Attorney General of British Columbia
6 submits that ss. 429 and 430 of the Criminal Code do not
7 violate s. 15 of the Charter. Accordingly, these sections do
8 not require justification under s. 1 of the Charter.
9
10
11
12
13
14

15
16 13. Parliament does not violate s. 15 of the Charter when 17 it prescribes different rules of criminal procedure depending 18 upon which Province an accused is tried.
19
20
21
22

23
24 14. "Province of trial" is not a ground enumerated in 25 s. 15 of the Charter. Nor is it a ground akin thereto. It
26 does not describe any human or immutable characteristic. It
27 does not refer to any group that has been subject to a
28 history of prejudice, misguided paternalism or ill-founded
29 stereotyping. Nor does it pertain to a group that has been
30 denied equal access to the political process. In R. v. CLP
31 Canmarket Lifestyle Products Corp. et al, [1988] 2 W.W.R. 170
32 (Man. C.A.) Sullivan, J.A. stated:
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40
41
42

43 "... the type of discrimination there prohibited
44 [in s. 15] is related to the quality of persons or 45 the class to which they belong. It does not in 46
47

1           itself prohibit discrimination of a geographical
2           nature."
3

4           15.       The Attorney General of British Columbia submits,
5           therefore, that ss. 429 and 430 of the Criminal Code (as they
6           read in May of 1985) do not trigger any scrutiny under s. 15
7           of the Charter. It is neither necessary nor appropriate to 8           review the rationale for treating Alberta differently than 9           the other provinces. This legislative distinction presents
10          solely a political issue.
11
12
13
14
15
16
17

18
19
20          16.       This submission that s. 15 only applies to laws that 21          discriminate on one of the enumerated grounds, or on grounds
22          akin thereto, was set out by the Attorney General of British 23          Columbia in Andrews v. Law Society of British Columbia. In 24          the event that this Court does not decide in Andrews whether 25          such a "threshold test" exists, then the submissions made by 26          the Attorney General of British Columbia in Andrews (excerpts 27          of which are included as Appendix B to this factum) are 28          adopted in this case.
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39

40          17.       Even if, arguendo, s. 15 scrutiny can be triggered by 41          legislative distinctions that bear no relation to the 42          enumerated grounds, nevertheless federal legislation which 43          bestow benefits or imposes burdens differently from province
44
45
46
47

1 to province should be accorded a special measure of deference
2 and indeed be presumptively valid. It should be presumed
3 that Parliament when it employs the criteria of "province" is
4 reacting to or is motivated by concerns of federalism.
5
6
7
8
9

10 18. If Parliament has used the criteria of "province" as a
11 short hand means of identifying the characteristics or 12 circumstances of individuals in a province, then that 13 criteria will almost invariably be underinclusive or 14 overinclusive. There will rarely, if ever, be a situation
15 where all of the people in one province share a common
16 characteristic that is not shared by some or all the people
17 in another province. If Parliament wants to bestow a benefit
18 on all "red-haired people" it will have to use the criteria
19 of "red-haired people" and not limit the benefit to persons
20 in British Columbia simply because there are statistics
21 suggesting a higher proportion of red-haired people in 22 British Columbia than in any other province.
23
24
25

29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37

38 19. If, however, Parliament employs the criteria of 39 "province" to reflect the institutional or jurisdictional
40 claims of a province, i.e. is responsive the interests of the 41 province qua province (which will ordinarily be the case and 42 hence the reasonableness of the presumption) then such laws
43
44
45
46
47

1 should always be held to be valid. Whether the province's
2 claim is compelling or reasonable should not present a
3 justiciable issue - that is an issue for Parliament in 4 deciding whether to treat one or more provinces differently.
5
6
7
8
9

10
11 20. Where the non-uniformity of federal legislation is 12 based on principles of federalism, it cannot violate s. 15 of 13 the Charter. This is because the federal principle being the 14 bedrock principle in our Constitution is paramount to the 15 principle of equality in the Charter. Or, simply, that the 16 right of equality guaranteed in s. 15 of the Charter must be 17 interpreted in a way which accommodates the federal 18 principle.

28
29 21. In Reference Re Full Funding for Roman Catholic
30 Separate High Schools, [1987] 1 S.C.R. 1148 @ 1207, Mr.
31 Justice Estey stated that s. 15 "cannot be interpreted as 32 rendering unconstitutional distinctions that are expressly
33 permitted by the Constitution Act, 1867". And Madam Justice 34 Wilson stated @ p. 1197: "It was never intended ... that the 35 Charter could be used to invalidate other provisions of the 36 constitution ...".

1 22. Federalism has two aspects: interstate and intrastate
2 federalism. Interstate federalism describes the allocation
3 of legislative power and financial resources between central
4 and regional governments. Intrastate federalism refers to 5 the "arrangements by which the interests of regional units -
6 the interest either of the government or of the residents of 7 these units - are channeled through and protected by the 8 structures and operations of the central government": Smiley
9 and Watts, The Return of Federal Institutions: Intrastate
10 Federalism in Canada, (Study Paper, Vol. 39, the Royal 11 Commission On The Economic Union And Development Prospects
12 For Canada, 1985).

27 23. Patrick Monahan in The Charter, Federalism and the 28 Supreme Court of Canada (1987 @ 170-171) writes:

29
30
31 "The writing on 'intrastate' federalism has 32 illustrated the unduly restrictive nature of these
33 traditional concerns. According to the intrastate
34 model, federalism can be defined in much broader 35 and unbounded way than has previously been 36 supposed. Federalism is simply a response to the 37 need to protect regional units in the structures
38 and operations of government. But there is no
39 necessary form that this federalist response will 40 take ... The central point is that protection for 41 regional units or communities can be achieved in at 42 least two quite distinct ways. The first is to 43 assign responsibility for matters in which 44 territorial interests are particularly sensitive to 45 state or provincial governments. The second is to 46 design mechanisms within the national government
47

1 itself which will channel and protect regional
2 interests. Either solution should be seen as an
3 acceptance of the federal principle.

4 There is no necessary contradiction between these
5 two strategies. Indeed, the British North America
6 Act incorporated both interstate and intrastate
7 elements in its attempt to devise a workable scheme
8 of government for the British Colonies."
9

10
11 24. Federal legislation which provides for different
12 rules of behaviour in different provinces in response to 13 legitimate provincial interests is a good example of 14 intrastate federalism in action. It is a direct and 15 commendable means of making the central government more
16 responsive to provincial concerns without in any way
17 "enhancing the power of provincial governments and 18 legislatures at the expense of the federal government":
19 Smiley and Watts, supra, p. 34.

31 In a case commentary that is critical of the Ontario
32 Court of Appeal decision in R. v. Hamilton (1987), 57 O.R.
33 (2d) 412, Dean John Whyte states:
34
35
36
37

38 "The Constitution does not merely allocate
39 legislative powers, it creates federalism, that is,
40 it endorses provinces as distinct political 41 communities for which separate regulatory treatment
42 is possible.
43

44 Furthermore, as has already been established, it
45 does not confine the capacity for separate
46 treatment to those matters listed in s. 92. Since
47

1 the Constitution expressly recognizes political
2 categories (provinces) and expressly recognizes
3 that different legislative regimes producing
4 different burdens and benefits can be created
5 (s. 92) and imposes no constraint on federal law
6 treating provinces as salient political units, the 7 decision of Dubin, J.A. [in Hamilton] represents
8 the application of a theory of Charter paramountcy
9 over other constitutionally - recognized
10 arrangements. This is pure invention. There is no
11 primacy of Charter values over federalist values;
12 one set of constitutional rules does not trump the 13 other. ... In fact, the very specific adoption of 14 provinces as a salient category in the Constitution
15 ought to prevail over the very general direction in 16 s. 15 not to adopt discriminatory categories in 17 legislation; the working out of which categories,
18 of all of the thousands of categories that 19 legislation contains, are to found violative of 20 s. 15 should reflect the presumption that 21 constitutionally - created categories are 22 permissible. ... This is not to suggest that
23 Parliament in creating province-based distinctions
24 can escape review under s. 15 altogether. It the 25 differentiation between provinces cannot be related 26 to distinct political claims, or to sensitivity to 27 the likelihood of there being distinct political 28 claims, the legislative regime should be struck
29 down."
30

31 20. In Cornell v. The Queen (Mar. 24, 1988, as yet 32 unreported), this Court held that Parliament could,
33 consistent with the Bill of Rights, make the proclamation of 34 s. 234.1 of the Criminal Code in any province conditional
35 upon the agreement of that province. This was held to be a 36 valid federal objective because "the question whether
37 s. 234.1 should be proclaimed in force in British Columbia
38 was viewed as one of [provincial] law enforcement priorities.

2 this Court gave effect to the principle of intrastate
3 federalism.
4
5
6
7

8 27. Because the province is charged with the enforcement
9 of the criminal law and has the constitutional authority over 10 the administration of criminal justice (even if there is also
11 concurrent federal jurisdiction, see Hogg, Constitutional Law
12 of Canada, 2nd Ed. @ pp. 430-433) and because the field of 13 criminal law will often overlap with other fields of 14 provincial jurisdiction, differences in the criminal law or 15 procedure between provinces in response to provincial claims
16 should always be valid on the basis of the federal principle.

28 28. The result in Cornell therefore should be the same if 29 the non-uniformity of s. 234.1 of the Criminal Code was 30 challenged under s. 15 of the Charter. Once the non-uniform
31 application of the criminal law is understood as being in 32 response to provincial law enforcement priorities and 33 allocation of resources that should end the inquiry. It is 34 for the province and the federal government, and not the 35 courts, to determine whether those priorities and resources
36 merit the non-uniform application of the criminal law.

4 conclusion reached by McKay, J. in The Queen v. Hansen

12 29. Section 430 of the Criminal Code (prior to its repeal 13 in 1985):
14
15

16
17 "grew out of the difficulties associated with 18 conducting such trials and getting twelve-person
19 juries in the Northwest Territories during the 20 nineteenth century. The preservation of the 21 special provisions in the Criminal Code
22 regarding murder trials in Alberta were retained
23 at the request of Alberta, and thus served a
24 valid federal objective in that it preserved a
25 mode of procedure to which Alberta had become 26 attuned prior to becoming a province in 1905."

30
31 CC. The demographics in Alberta were and are no doubt
32 similar to the demographics in some other provinces. The 33 validity of s. 430 need not depend upon the people or 34
35 circumstances in Alberta being different from those in any
36 other province. Indeed, it is valid even if there are no
37
38 differences between the people or circumstances in Alberta
39 and those in any other province. It is valid because the 40
41 Attorney General of Alberta, unlike the Attorney General of 42
43
44
45
46
47

1 any other province, requested that Parliament permit the
2 retention in Alberta of a mode of trial that was rooted in 3 history and had been the traditional and acceptable way of 4 trying cases in that province. Tradition aside, s. 430 is 5 valid simply because it is reasonable to assume that every
6 Attorney General in Alberta believed that the administration
7 of justice was better served by affording the accused the 8 option of being tried by a judge alone, as well as by a judge
9 with a jury. Although Parliament has the exclusive authority
10 to enact criminal procedure, the fact is that most rules of 11 criminal procedure have a significant impact on the 12 administration of criminal justice in the province. It is 13 entirely appropriate, therefore, that Parliament be permitted
14 to tailor its rules of criminal procedure to meet legitimate
15 provincial concerns. Parliament obviously does not have to 16 do so but as long as Parliament ensures that an accused in 17 every province is afforded his or her basic constitutional
18 rights then there should be nothing unconstitutional if
19 Parliament, at the behest of a province, prescribes
20 additional rights to the accused in that province. The fact
21 that trials by judge alone are less costly and less onerous
22 for the citizenry than are trials by judge and jury, is but
23 another reason why s. 430 should be seen as having an impact

1 on the allocation of provincial resources and priorities, and
2 for that reason as well, is valid.

6 31. Balkanization of the criminal law will not result by 7 reason of a decision of this Court that it will not review or 8 invalidate federal criminal laws that vary in their scope or 9 application from province to province. There has always been
10 a strongly held belief in Canada which can be traced right
11 back to the Confederation debates, that uniformity of the 12 criminal law is highly desirable. Even though the 13 administration of justice is a matter within provincial 14 competence "plurality of criminal law administration ... to 15 correspond to plurality or diversity of social conditions ...
16 has just not occurred": McWhinney, "Pluralistic Federalism In 17 Canada" in Federalism and Development of Legal Systems, 25 @
18 41 (1971). The political forces favouring uniformity of the 19 criminal law are accordingly very strong. Diversity to 20 reflect provincial concerns has been an exceptional
21 occurrence and will undoubtedly remain so. If, however,
22 Parliament in its wisdom chooses to vary the criminal law or 23 procedure in order to accommodate provincial claims, then 24 that progressive process of intrastate federalism should not
25 be thwarted by Charter.

(3) Where an accused elects to be tried by a magistrate, the justice shall endorse on the information a statement that the accused has so elected and shall remand the accused to appear and plead to the charge before a magistrate having jurisdiction over that offence in the territorial division in which the offence is alleged to have been committed.

488. An accused who is charged with an indictable offence other than an offence that is mentioned in section 427 shall, where he elects under section 464, 484 or 492 to be tried by a judge without jury, be tried, subject to this Part, by a judge without a jury. 1953-54, c. 51, s. 472.

ATTORNEY GENERAL MAY REQUIRE TRIAL BY JURY.

498. The Attorney General may, notwithstanding that an accused elects under section 464, 484, 491 or 492 to be tried by a judge or magistrate, as the case may be, require the accused to be tried by a court composed of a judge and jury, unless the alleged offence is one that is punishable with imprisonment for five years or less, and where the Attorney General so requires, a judge or magistrate has no jurisdiction to try the accused under this Part and a magistrate shall hold a preliminary inquiry unless a preliminary inquiry has been held prior to the requirement by the Attorney General that the accused be tried by a court composed of a judge and jury. 1968-69, c. 38, s. 43.

PART III

ARGUMENT

1
2
3
4
5
6
7
8
9 1. The Appellant, the Attorney General of British 10 Columbia, agrees generally with the approach to s. 15 of the 11 Charter adopted by the British Columbia Court of Appeal. It
12 is submitted, however, that the Court of Appeal erred in 13 concluding that the Respondent had discharged his onus of 14 proving that the citizenship requirement in s. 42 of the 15 Barristers and Solicitors Act was unreasonable or unfair and 16 therefore in violation of s. 15 of the Charter.
17
18
19
20
21
22
23
24
25

26
27 2. Section 15 applies to both the administration of the 28 law ("equality before the law") and to the content of the 29 law ("equality under the law"). This interpretation is 30 consistent with the "explanatory note" which accompanied the 31 final draft of s. 15 when it was tabled in the House of 32 Commons: see Elliott, "Interpretating The Charter - Use of 33 The Earlier Versions As An Aid" (1982), U.B.C. L. Rev. 11
34 @ 38. Professor Elliott says (@ p. 17) that the explanatory 35 note suggests "that the phrase 'equal before and under the 36 law' is intended to describe not the scope of the right to 37 equality as such, but the spheres of governmental activity
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47

4.

1 to which the right to equality can be applied".
2
3

4
5 3. The right guaranteed in s. 15 is "the right to equal
6 protection and equal benefit of the law [both in its 7 administration and content] without discrimination".
8
9

10
11
12
13 4. The phrases "equal protection and benefit" and 14 "without discrimination" are "interacting expressions,
15 colouring each other ... and hence to be considered together
16 as a compendious expression of a norm.": Miller et al v. The 17 Queen, [1977] 2 S.C.R. 680 @ 690. These phrases capture two 18 essential elements of the norm of equality guaranteed in 19 s. 15. A law violates s. 15 because of the choice of 20 certain criteria upon which a burden is imposed or a benefit
21 is bestowed and the unreasonableness or unfairness of that 22 criteria given the purpose of the law.
23
24
25
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34

35 5. The Court of Appeal's inquiry was similarly in two 36 steps. The Court first considered whether the criteria of 37 "citizenship" was "capable of falling with s. 15": Case, p.
38 104 and concluded that it was "a potential ground of 39 discrimination under s. 15": Case, p. 105. The Court of 40 Appeal then considered the "ultimate question": Case, p.
41
42
43
44
45
46
47

5.

1 103, which asked whether this criteria was "unreasonable or
2 unfair": Case, pp. 103, 105. This requirement that the
3 criteria must be reasonable is also implicit in the aphorism
4 that those who are "similarly situated be similarly
5 treated": Case, pp. 96-97.
6
7
8
9
10
11
12

13 6. There are not an infinite kind of criteria which 14 might be discriminatory. Rather, the criteria enumerated in 15 s. 15 of the Charter are illustrative, albeit not 16 exhaustive, of the kinds of criteria that might be 17 discriminatory. Any law which classifies on one of the 18 enumerated grounds or on grounds similar thereto, these 19 triggers s. 15 scrutiny. Such law must then pass the test
20 of reasonableness as articulated by the Court of Appeal.
21 Conversely, a law which classifies neither on the enumerated
22 grounds nor on grounds akin thereto does not pass this 23 threshold test in s. 15 and therefore the Court need not and 24 ought not scrutinize the reasonableness or fairness of the 25 legislative classification.
26
27
28
29
30
31
32
33
34
35
36
37
38
39
40

41 7. This analytical approach to s. 15 was expressly
42 adopted in three recent decisions of the British Columbia
43 Supreme Court: Scott v. A.G.B.C., [1986] 5 W.W.R. 207;
44
45
46
47

6.

1 A.G.B.C. v. Husband Prov. J. and Page (1986) 4 B.C.L.R. (2d)
2
3 295 and Beltz v. Law Society of B.C., [1986] 1 W.W.R. 427 @
4
5 437. Indeed in: B.C.T.F. et al v. A.G.B.C. et al, [1987] 1
6
7 W.W.R. 527 @ 535 the B.C. Court of Appeal suggested that the
8 enumerated grounds may, in fact, be exhaustive. And in Milk
9
10 Board v. Clearview Dairy (Unreported B.C.C.A., Mar. 4, 1987, 11
12 Reg. No. CA005312), the B.C. Court of Appeal rejected the 13
14 s. 15 claim brought by a corporation on the ground, inter
15
16 alia, that "a corporation has no race, national or ethnic
17
18 origin, colour, religion, sex, age, mental or physical 19
20 disability nor any other comparable quality". (emphasis
21
22 added) See, however Wilson and Maxson v. Medical Services
23
24 Commission of B.C. et al, [1987] 3 W.W.R. 48 @ 83
25
26 (B.C.S.C.) where this "threshold test" was not applied.
27
28
29
30

31 8. It is submitted that the purpose of s. 15 was to 32
33 constitutionalize the values that found protection and were 34
35 enhanced by human rights legislation enacted by the 36
37 provincial Legislatures and the federal Parliament as well
38
39 as by states pursuant to international law - all of which 40
41 provide the historical and philosophical basis for s. 15.
42
43 The grounds enumerated in s. 15 are similar to those that 44
45 are specifically included and prohibited in such human
46
47 rights (or anti-discrimination) legislation or conventions,

7.

1 all of which have a "closed list" of such prohibited
2 grounds. (See e.g. Human Rights Act, S.B.C. 1984, c. 22,

1 9. Tarnopolsky in Discrimination and The Law (1982) @
2
3 840 summarizes his review of the Canadian legislation:

4 "To reiterate, the various anti-discrimination
5 statutes in Canada prohibit specific actions
6 taken 'because of' certain specified grounds and 7 thereby provide illustrations of what is 8 'discrimination' against someone."
9

10
11
12 10. Like human rights legislation, s. 15 will
13 likely be interpreted to prohibit both direct and indirect
14 discrimination on the enumerated grounds and grounds akin 15 thereto.

29 11. It is significant that although the 14th Amendment
30 of the U.S. Constitution does not have a "without 31 discrimination" clause, the U.S. Supreme Court has, with 32 rare exceptions, found violations of the 14th Amendment only 33 when there have been legislative classifications similar to 34 the enumerated grounds in s. 15. All other classifications
35 have been subjected to what is called the "mere rationality 36 test" and such classifications have nearly always been held

1 S.C.R. 693 @ 700; and see also: Beauregard v. Canada (1986),
2
3 70 N.R. 1 @ 57 (S.C.C.). In no case however has the Supreme
4
5 Court invalidated a law which involved a non-prohibited
6
7 ground. Nor has the Court ever said that the list of 8
9 potentially discriminatory grounds is infinite. However,
10
11 even if s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights could be 12
13 violated by a legislative classification that was not
14
15 similar to the prohibited grounds of discrimination, that 16
17 would be due to the text of s. 1 of the Canadian Bill of 18
19 Rights which is very different from s. 15 of the Charter.
20
21 It will be noticed that the prohibited grounds of 22
23 discrimination in the Canadian Bill of Rights are 24
25 set out in the opening paragraph of s. 1 which purports to 26
27 qualify all of the rights and freedoms set out in 28
29 subsections 1(a) to 1 (f). It is understandable, therefore,
30
31 that the existence of the prohibited grounds of 32
33 discrimination could not be a sine qua non to a violation of 34
35 s. 1(b) of the Canadian Bill of Rights because that would 36
37 mean that these prohibited grounds would have to be a sine
38
39 qua non to a violation of ss. 1(a), (due process), 1(c),
40
41 (freedom of religion), 1(d), (freedom of speech), 1(e),
42
43 (freedom of assembly and association) and 1(f), (freedom of 44
45 the press). That would make no sense at all.
46
47

11.

1 14. It is submitted that a different approach to s. 15
2 of the Charter is also justified because of the 3 fundamentally different nature of the Charter and the 4 Canadian Bill of Rights. The Charter, unlike the Canadian
5 Bill of Rights, not only applies to all levels of government
6 but is the supreme law of Canada. Inevitably the Charter
7 will require the Courts "to enter the legislative sphere":
8 Alberta Union of Provincial Employees, supra, @ 31, in a
9 manner never contemplated by the Canadian Bill of Rights.
10 However, it is submitted that this "intrusion into the field
11 of legislation": Alberta Union of Provincial Employees, 12 supra, @ 31, should only occur when expressly authorized by 13 the Constitution and not by any "implication": Alberta Union
14 of Provincial Employees, supra, @ 31. It is submitted that 15 -- interpret s. 15 of the Charter as "open-ended" is not 16 only to "overshoot its purpose": R. v. Big M. Drug Mart,
17 supra, @ 344, but is also inconsistent with the "character
18 and the larger objects of the Charter itself": Big M. Drug
19 Mart, supra, @ 344, which is founded on the fact that 20 "Canadian society is to be free and democratic": R. v.
21 Oakes, [1986] 1 S.C.R. 103 @ 136 (emphasis added).

1 discriminatory then no distinction will exist between the
2
3 Court's legitimate function of scrutinizing legislation for 4
5 its constitutionality and its illegitimate function in a
6
7 democracy of scrutinizing the wisdom, policy or merits of 8
9 legislation viz its rationality, reasonableness or fairness:
10
11 see Reference Re S. 94(2) of the Motor Vehicle Act, [1986] 1
12
13 W.W.R. 481 @ 489-490 (S.C.C.).
14
15

16
17 16. If s. 15 scrutiny was triggered by any legislative 18
19 classification then the courts will inevitably and 20
21 continually be thrust into the "bog of legislative policy-
22
23 making": Curr v. The Queen, [1972] S.C.R. 889 @ 902. All
24
25 laws draw distinctions on the basis of who we are or what we 26
27 do. If the ultimate measure of equality is the rationality,
28
29 reasonableness or fairness of the legislative distinction,
30
31 then it will always be possible for someone to present a
32
33 reasonable argument (often at great length and expense) that
34
35 the Legislature would have acted rationally or reasonably or 36
37 fairly only if it had redrawn its legislative lines to 38
39 encompass or exclude certain individual or group of 40
41 individuals.
42
43

44
45 17. It is also very likely that these claims, even if 46
47

13.

1 ultimately unsuccessful, will be frequently made. Anyone
 2 who is charged pursuant to legislation and perhaps anyone
 3 who seriously objects to the policy of an enactment will be
 4 tempted to invoke s. 15:
 5
 6
 7

8 "Section 15, like the 14th Amendment in the U.S.
 9 Constitution will dwarf the other provisions of 10 the Charter and be the central issue in virtually
 11 any Charter litigation. Laws which do not violate
 12 any other fundamental right or freedom, will 13 almost always (if the U.S. experience is any 14 guide) be alleged to violate s. 15 because the 15 Legislature classified or failed to classify.
 16 Even though legislation does not violate any other
 17 sections, it will always be required to run the 18 gauntlet of s. 15 and s. 1. In my view, this 19 cannot have been the intention of the enactors of 20 the Charter."

26
 27 18. Indeed, this prophecy is in the process of being 28 fulfilled. Section 15 has already spawned the kind of 29 litigation that is not infrequently brought under the 14th
 30 Amendment of the U.S. Constitution. For example, the 31 following legislative classifications have been alleged to 32 be potentially discriminatory and thus violate the right to 33 equality:

23        thereto, cannot be reconciled with democratic theory.
24        Dean John Hart Ely in Democracy & Distrust: A Theory of 25        Judicial Review (1980 @ 103), argues persuasively that in a
26        democracy judicial review should focus on the democratic
27        process to ensure that the process does not dysfunction
28        rather than on the outcomes of the process. A review of the 29        reasonableness of every impugned legislative criteria and
30        thus the outcome of the legislative process is not required

20. Professor Patrick Monahan claims that "the democratic conception" of judicial review propounded by Dean Ely and others in relation to the U.S. Constitution is even more compelling in Canada. In "Judicial Review And Democracy: A Theory of Judicial Review", (1987), 21 U.B.C. Law Rev. 87 @ 89-90 Professor Monahan states:

"The claim which I defend is premised on a distinction between the substantive outcomes of the political process and the fairness of that process itself. In my view, the judiciary should not undertake the task of testing the substantive outcomes of the political process against some theory of the right or the good. The resolution of Charter issues is not to be found in the philosophies of John Rawls, Robert Nozick or Ronald Dworkin. Rather, the central focus of judicial review should be on the integrity of the political process itself. The judiciary should interpret constitutional guarantees in such a way that the opportunities for public debate and collective deliberation are enhanced. To put the matter simply, constitutional adjudication should be in the name of democracy, rather than right answers.

Readers familiar with the American literature will recognize the similarity between this argument and the work of John Hart Ely. ...

My claim is that the representation - reinforcing theory of judicial review, although originally formulated in the American context, actually offers a far more convincing account of the purposes underlying the Canadian Charter.

See also: Dickson, C.J., "The Democratic Character of the Charter of Rights" in Law and Politics Of The Judicial Process In Canada, (edited by F.L. Morton, (1984) @ 325-327):

"In this regard I commend to you a statement by the Committee on the Constitution of the Canadian Bar Association:

'A democracy is the basis and prerequisite for the operation of the supremacy of Parliament. That being so, it would seem justifiable to entrench in a constitution principles which are prerequisites to the existence of ~~democracy~~. ...

21. A review of the rationality or reasonableness of legislative classifications "leads courts and counsel into a labyrinth of fictions:" Linde, supra, @ 207. Testing the law for rationality creates intractable difficulties that are intrinsic to the process of judicial review. Linde summarizes these difficulties as follows:

"[T]he test depends on attributing a purpose to the law maker; but laws are often an accommodation of several unrelated purposes. Commonly, a law will push toward a goal only within the limits of objectives that may or may not be apparent in retrospect. Legislative declarations and legislative history cannot be relied on to reflect the actual balance of considerations that shaped the law, and often no such records are available. Although proponents might have wished for more and opponents for less, all that is certain about the law as a means to an end is that a majority could be found to undertake what the law in fact undertakes, no more, no less. That much is its

1 immediate goal. If judicial review may hold a law
2 invalid for failure to match some greater purpose,
3 it places a premium on the manner in which the 4 counsel and court phrase the supposed legislative
5 goals. Many of our laws simply reflect old
6 notions of right and wrong, or sympathy toward the 7 equity of some particular claim to legislative 8 consideration, without intending to achieve any
9 pragmatic aim. Such a law may be unconstitutional
10 if it pursues a goal that the Constitution
11 forbids, but not because the values it reflects
12 are merely sentimental, or parochial, or old
13 fashioned, or foolish, rather than goal oriented.
14 ... Finally, judicial review of rationality is 15 irretrievably ambivalent about time - whether to 16 match past facts to past purposes, or present
17 facts to past purposes, or present facts to 18 present purposes - because it is ambivalent about
19 its premise, whether it means to review the one
20 time reasonableness of lawmakers or the continuing 21 reasonableness of laws." (pp. 220 - 222).

22
23
24 22. The comments of McIntyre, J. in Alberta Union of 25 Provincial Employees, supra, @ 30 are an equally apt
26
27 response to the claim that courts should review the 28
29 rationality or reasonableness of all legislative 30
31 classifications: "None of these issues is amenable to 32
33 principled resolutions. There are no clearly correct
34
35 answers to these questions. They are of a nature peculiarly
36
37 apposite to the functions of the Legislature".
38
39
40

41
42 23. Furthermore, review of rationality involves 43
44 important assumptions about the lawmaking process. Linde
45
46 asserts that "no courts should invalidate an act of 47

19.

1 government for failure to comply with the constitutional
2 rule unless the rule is one with which the government should 3 have complied, or should know how to comply with in the 4 future" (p. 222). Linde suggests that if we were to take
5 the formula of rational law making seriously it would impose
6 on lawmakers demands which would involve an enormous
7 requirement of time and which bear no relation to the 8 reality of the lawmaking process: Linde, supra, @ pp. 222 -
9 224.

20
21 24. It might be argued that this threshold test would
22 allow some entirely arbitrary and capricious laws to escape
23 s. 15 scrutiny. A law, e.g., which stipulate that "only
24 persons who drive red cars are entitled to a driver's 25 licence" would seem entirely arbitrary but the legislative 26 classification "those who drive red cars" is not similar to 27 an enumerated ground and thus would not potentially 28 discriminate. It is submitted, however, that it would be a
29 grave mistake for the Court to approach and interpret s. 15
30 on the assumption that such legislation would ever be 31 possible. It would not. Prior to the Charter the 32 Legislature did not act in such arbitrary fashion. There is 33 no reason to believe or assume that it would do so after the 34 Charter.

15 26. Dean Ely, (Democracy and Distrust, supra, @ 181-183,
16
17 responds to critics of his theory of constitutional
18
19 interpretation, which likewise leaves open the possibility
20
21 of arbitrary laws remaining unreviewable, such as those 22
23 which make it "a crime for any person to remove another
24
25 person's gall bladder, except to save that person's life" as 26
27 follows:
28

29 "It is an entirely legitimate response to the gall
30
31 bladder law to note that it couldn't pass and 32
33 refuse to play any further. In fact it can only
34
35 deform our constitutional jurisprudence to tailor
36
37 it to laws that couldn't be enacted, since
38
39 constitutional law appropriately exists for those 40
41 situations where representative government cannot 42
43 be trusted, not those where we know it can."

"Laws may be enacted for reasons we happen to disagree with, but it seems implausible to suppose that laws are enacted for no reason at all ... The only real function of the rational basis test is to make the judicial balancing of interests less apparent and thus seemingly more legitimate."

And see: Felix Cohen, "Transcendental Nonsense and the Functional Approach" (1930), 33 Columbia L. Rev. 808 @ 819:

"Taken seriously this conception [of a rationality standard] makes of our courts lunacy commissions sitting in judgment upon the mental capacity of legislators and, occasionally, of judicial brethren."

28. It is also obvious that if any truly draconian legislation was invoked the courts would be able to resort to s. 7 of the Charter which protects certain fundamental interests and s. 12 which is concerned primarily with arbitrary measures.

29. A "reasonableness" or "fairness" test involves a higher standard of scrutiny than a mere rationality test: Case, p. 103. An inquiry into the reasonableness or fairness of a legislative criteria also is patently and overtly an inquiry into the wisdom or policy of the law and

1 perhaps more so than would be the case if the inquiry was
2 one of mere rationality. This higher level of scrutiny is
3 justifiable, however, only if s. 15 review is triggered by 4 laws that classify on the enumerated grounds or grounds akin
5 thereto. Furthermore, if s. 15 is so construed then it
6 makes sense to have a single test since all criteria which
7 trigger s. 15 scrutiny will fall within either the "suspect"
8 or "sensitive" category: Case, p. 105. This does not mean
9 that the application of the test will yield the same result
10 no matter what potentially discriminatory criteria is in 11 issue. It will always be easier to demonstrate the 12 unfairness or unreasonableness of a law which classifies on 13 the basis of race than it will when the criteria is age or 14 disability. See: City of Cleburne, Texas v. Cleburne Living
15 Centre, 87 L Ed 2d 313 @ 327-329 (1985) per Stevens, J.

32 30. Judicial review of legislative classifications based
33 on the enumerated grounds or grounds similar thereto is easy
34 to reconcile with democratic theory - it is required by the 35 text of the Constitution. There can be no question as to 36 the legitimacy of judicial review in this context even 37 though the ultimate test will inevitably be one of 38 reasonableness or fairness. Even if s. 15 did not expressly 39 enumerate these prohibited grounds, judicial review of such

1 "suspect" or "sensitive" classifications can be reconciled
2 with democratic principles since such classifications may be
3 motivated by prejudice and "prejudice against discrete and
4 insular minorities may be a special condition which tends to 5 curtail the operation of those political processes
6 ordinarily to be relied upon to protect minorities": The

19 31. Dean Ely recognizes the legitimacy of judicial 20 review with respect to legislative classifications that are 21 "race-like" (Democracy and Distrust, supra, @ p. 149) which 22 includes classifications that relate to groups that "we know
23 to be the object of widespread vilification, groups we know
24 others (specifically those who control the legislative 25 process) might wish to injure": (id @ p. 153). Hence, Dean
26 Ely states that malfunctions in democratic process occur
27 when, inter alia:

37 "Though no one is actually denied a voice or a
38 vote, representatives beholden to an effective
39 majority are systematically disadvantaging some 40 minority out of simple hostility or a prejudiced
41 refusal to recognize commonalities of interest,
42 and thereby denying that minority the protection
43 afforded other groups by a representative
44 system.": (@ p. 103).

1 32. Professor Hans A. Linde (as he then was), in
2
3 "Due Process of Lawmaking", supra, @ 201 - 203, argues that
4
5 the Equal Protection clause of the 14th Amendment should
6
7 allow for judicial review only with respect to "suspect
8
9 classifications" although he admits that there is "room for 10
11 debate about what the list of suspect classifications should 12
13 include." (p. 201) He describes the purpose of judicial 14
15 review with respect to such classifications as follows:

16
17 "For what is it that 'suspect classifications' are 18
19 suspected of? The suspicion, in that phrase, is 20
21 suspicion of prejudice - not simply prejudgment
22
23 based on ignorance and mistaken notions of fact,
24
25 but invidious prejudgment, grounded in notions of 26
27 superiority and inferiority, in beliefs about
28
29 relative worth, attitudes that deny the premise of 30
31 human equality and that will not be readily
32
33 sacrificed to mere facts. The suspicion of 34
35 prejudice focuses on the lawmaker's sense of 36
37 values, not on his rationality." (p. 201).
38
39
40
41
42
43
44
45
46
47

31 33. Professor Monahan is of the view that "the norm of 32
33 equality is designed to take account of the fact that
34
35 certain groups and individuals possess unequal access to the 36
37 political system.": Monahan, supra, @ 149. Although this
38
39 concept is different from the concept of prejudice that Dean
40
41 Ely espouses and which Professor Monahan criticizes, it
42
43 nevertheless is consistent with the submission that s. 15 is 44
45
46
47

25.

1 only triggered by laws which classify on the enumerated
2 grounds or grounds similar thereto.
3

4 34. It is submitted that whether a particular
5 legislative classification is akin to one of the enumerated
6 grounds must be determined on a case-by-case basis. The 7 common underlying factors of the enumerated grounds are that
8 they refer to human characteristics that are essentially
9 immutable, to groups which have been subject to a history of 10 prejudice and have directly and perhaps systemically been 11 denied an equal voice in and equal access to the political 12 process. The approach must at all times be a "generous
13 rather than a legalistic one": R. v. Big M. Drug Mart Ltd., 14 supra, @ 344.

28 35. Applying these criteria and employing a generous
29 interpretation to s. 15 of the Charter, it is conceded that
30 "citizenship" is a classification that triggers s. 15
31 scrutiny. Although not an immutable characteristic it is 32 one, like religion, that may be difficult to change without 33 fundamentally altering one's sense of identity; it might 34 conceivably be used by a government as a colourable means of 35 discriminating against persons on the basis of race or 36 national origin; since citizenship is a precondition of
